MARKETING PSYCHOLOGY

BY JOHN MASON AND STAFF OF ACS DISTANCE EDUCATION
CONTENTS

Credits .................................................................................................................. 4

CHAPTER 1 WHAT IS MARKETING PSYCHOLOGY? ..................................................... 5
An Overview .......................................................................................................... 5
Roles in Marketing Psychology ........................................................................... 6
Qualifications and Jobs ....................................................................................... 6
Applications of Marketing Psychology ............................................................... 8
Myths About Marketing Psychology ................................................................... 9
Future Directions .................................................................................................. 10

CHAPTER 2 WHO WE SELL TO - UNDERSTANDING THE CONSUMER .......... 11
Principles of Marketing Psychology .................................................................. 11
The Buying Process .............................................................................................. 14
Target Market ...................................................................................................... 15
Geographic .......................................................................................................... 15
Demographics ...................................................................................................... 16
Psychographics ................................................................................................... 17
Other influences on Consumers ........................................................................ 18
What We Sell ........................................................................................................ 21

CHAPTER 3 PSYCHOLOGY OF CONSUMER BEHAVIOUR ................................ 23
Introduction .......................................................................................................... 23
Gestalt Principles of Perception ......................................................................... 23
The Iceberg Principle .......................................................................................... 25
The Dynamic Principle ........................................................................................ 25
Emotions and Buying Behaviour Response ....................................................... 26
The Meaning of Colours ...................................................................................... 27

CHAPTER 4 MARKET RESEARCH TECHNIQUES ............................................... 30
Introduction .......................................................................................................... 30
Gathering Data ..................................................................................................... 30
Testing Products ................................................................................................. 33
Testing Advertisements ....................................................................................... 33
Market Segmentation ......................................................................................... 34
The information in this book is derived from a broad cross section of resources (research, reference materials and personal experience) from the authors and editorial assistants in the academic department of ACS Distance Education. It is, to the best of our knowledge, composed as an accurate representation of what is accepted and appropriate information about the subject, at the time of publication.

The authors fully recognise that knowledge is continually changing, and awareness in all areas of study is constantly evolving. As such, we encourage the reader to recognise that nothing they read should ever be considered to be set in stone. They should always strive to broaden their perspective and deepen their understanding of a subject, and before acting upon any information or advice, should always seek to confirm the currency of that information, and the appropriateness to the situation in which they find themselves.

As such, the publisher and author do not accept any liability for actions taken by the reader based upon their reading of this book.
CHAPTER 1 WHAT IS MARKETING PSYCHOLOGY?

Marketing psychology is concerned with understanding people’s purchasing behaviour and applying that understanding to the advertising, marketing and ultimately the selling of products or services. In this chapter we unravel what marketing psychology entails and how it can best be understood.

An Overview

To begin with it is worthwhile attempting to define what is meant by marketing psychology. In simple terms, it can be viewed as the marriage of two words - ‘marketing’ and ‘psychology.’

- Marketing refers to all the processes which go into advertising and selling a product or service.
- Psychology is the study of human behaviour.

As such, marketing psychology may be regarded as the study of consumer behaviour and application of that understanding to the sale of goods. In fact, it is often referred to as ‘consumer psychology’. The American Psychological Association considers consumer psychology to be a special division or subdivision of organisational psychology.

For the purposes of this book, we'll stick with the term ‘marketing psychology’, but bear in mind that it is interchangeable with consumer psychology. You’ll also encounter the term ‘market research’. Market research is a part, but not all, of what those working in marketing psychology may be involved in. It refers to the use of research tools and statistical analyses to study and interpret consumer behaviour.

Whilst some people who work in the field of applied marketing psychology may be qualified psychologists, others may have a background in marketing. Still others may come from a range of related fields such as advertising, retail sales, or even anthropology. Only those with a degree in psychology could call themselves psychologists, but psychologist or not, many people in the industry apply marketing psychology theory and methods in their work.

Now that you have a general overview into what marketing psychology is, let’s take a look in more depth.
Roles in Marketing Psychology

The types of job roles which someone working in the psychology of marketing may be involved in will often be dictated by the place of employment. For example, a psychologist working at a university may spend a good deal of their time conducting research into buying behaviour. Someone employed by a market research company may spend more time gathering data from questionnaires and analysing the information obtained.

Some of the different roles in marketing psychology include:

- Determining the demographics of the target market - age, gender, ethnicity, socioeconomic status, location, and so forth.
- Researching the types of products and services which might appeal to the target market.
- Applying principles of social psychology to get information to the target market.
- Researching consumer behaviour.
- Collecting data about consumer behaviour from questionnaires, surveys, observations, group studies and experiments.

People who use marketing psychology may be involved in helping businesses and services to look at the best ways to market their products, and how to apply psychological principles to the marketing of their products. Individuals, small business owners, and others wishing to sell a product or service can also use the principles of marketing psychology to improve how they reach their intended market and make sales.

Qualifications and Jobs

Skills and knowledge in marketing psychology has literally hundreds of applications. When you strip it right back, all organisations that offer goods or services rely on attracting potential customers, and some form of transaction with another person - whether a car sales yard, a health centre, an online shop, a restaurant or any other business or organisation you can think of.

Every business or organisation will have to appeal to their target market to encourage them to purchase their goods or services, or to use the organisation in the desired way. This will require an understanding of the target market’s needs, wants and desires, and how to appeal to them in order to entice them to engage, and ultimately to make a purchase. You can see, then, how important marketing psychology is to the survival and success of any organisation.

Larger organisations may have a whole team of people dedicated to marketing psychology, other small businesses may utilise one person who has knowledge in many areas of business, including marketing psychology.

Most positions that exist in an organisation, whilst not necessarily directly related, will benefit from a worker with a background in marketing psychology.

For example, consider a massage therapist working in a day spa. Their job may be to provide massage services to clients, however, with marketing psychology skills they will be able to bring added benefits to the day spa (and client), such as by upselling the client to a longer treatment, or a treatment that includes other services (such as a facial); getting the client to book a regular treatment; or engaging in the customer in a way that they feel that they are getting an extra special treatment and so will go away and tell their friends about it.

Marketing Psychology is also imperative in many other organisations that don't include the standard model of a customer purchasing goods or services. Marketing psychology is also useful for organisations such as charities – to gain financial support or to engage volunteer workers; public services, such as public libraries or public health services to gain patrons; political campaigns to gain support; big companies such as mining companies that are looking to influence the opinions of the public in order to achieve their goals; Universities and schools to gain students; and so on.

As mentioned in the previous section, people may come to marketing psychology from many different disciplines, education and experience. People will often come to marketing psychology from a background in either marketing or psychology. Marketing is intrinsically linked to psychology by its very nature, so students of marketing will generally have some grasp of psychology. Psychology has many different areas of specialisation, and marketing psychology is one of them. It encompasses several areas that a psychology student will study, so is a natural progression for the student that has an inclination towards psychology in the business arena.

Whilst many people will gain an education in either marketing or psychology, or marketing psychology before entering the workforce, other people will learn as they go. For example, starting in a sales position, developing skills and moving into marketing psychology; or starting a small business, and realising that to succeed you will need to develop some marketing psychology skills and then learning more (whether formally or informally).